Designer Christie Grove, principal of namesake Christie Grove Interiors, says the client is always the driving force in her process. “We may enter a space with a notion of what it should or can become, but the creativity begins when we learn about the client, who they are and how they live,” she says. While some clients are very aware of what they want from the start, with visuals at the ready; others don’t find it so easy to articulate what they like or why they like something. “It is our job to interpret those ideas and make their ideal space come to life,” she adds. Grove brings more than 20 years of residential design experience and eight years working on new build yachts to her recently formed firm. With a focus on greater Seattle, across the country, and as far as Europe, Christie Grove Interiors has experienced tremendous growth since inception. “Whether a new kitchen, full remodel or ground-up build, each project brings a new opportunity for success,” says Grove, who measures her success not only by how happy her clients are, but the relationships that prosper from the collaborations with others in the trade. Rather than work in a specific vernacular, Grove and her team create thoughtful spaces that relate to the environment. Living in the Pacific Northwest makes this an easy task. “We are so fortunate to live in a city surrounded by such incredible natural beauty,” she says.

ASK THE EXPERT

What are some ways clients can work with trade professionals to ensure a painless design process?

An open, transparent and communicative relationship between the client and designer helps make the process productive and hopefully, fun.

What type of project or location would you love to take on or work in?

At my previous firm, I traveled to Europe often, so I would love to do more work internationally.

What is the next move for your firm?

We are open to different types of offerings, whether consulting on where to hang an art collection or designing custom furniture and light fixtures. I hope we can continue to work with local artists to bring these ideas to life in the near future.
